Excerpt from Sketch of the History, Government and Resources of British India: With Tables of the Revenue and Expenditure In the following pages, therefore, it is not intended to discuss either the commercial privileges or the trade of the Company; first, because they have already been the subject of general investigation; secondly, because it has been pretty well demonstrated that the Company lose by their Indian commerce, while the private trade yearly increases; and thirdly, because it is so clear that individuals can always carry on mercantile pursuits to much greater advantage than chartered companies, that those who are unable to perceive the truth of such an evident principle, will certainly be inaccessible to every other argument, while those who acquiesce in it must, to be consistent, concede every thing else. Add to this the consideration, that, if the trade be really attended with a loss, the Company play the part of the dog in the manger, in wishing to exclude the public from it; and, if it be profitable, there can be no equity in giving it to a few in preference of the many; and there is a strength of argument on a broad principle, which no reasoning on minor parts of the question can shake, much less overturn.
