Excerpt: . . . of the freedom of movement and the arbitrary discretionary powers conferred on the inspection authorities. In particular the provisions relating to the scope of the Act, and the meaning of the words trade associations, are in part too narrow and in part absolutely indefinite. The discretionary powers conferred on the administrative authorities taken together with the provisions relating to the duties and rights of governing bodies, officials, and members of trade associations, entirely fetter the activity of such associations. The general terms in which liability is imposed opens the door to blackmailers. The provisions relating to the withdrawal of legal capacity are so extensive that they render the very existence of trade associations questionable. If the Bill were to pass into law in its present form, this part of it would remain a dead letter, as associations of employers and employed would not trouble themselves to acquire a legal capacity so conditioned. In order to gain for trade associations the advantage of an assured right to own property and of an extension of their freedom of movement, the Committee of the Society for Social Reform expresses the wish and the hope that the Reichstag will amend and develop the Bill in a manner corresponding to the actual needs of trade associations and calculated to regulate their rights and duties freely and justly, since such action would undoubtedly at the same time be to the public advantage. 7. --Extract from the resolutions of the fourteenth Congress...
