The following table (see page 104) is given, showing the state of the pulse, respiration, and temperature morning and evening, from the 7th, one day after the setting in of tetanus (and sixteen after tho injury) to the 31st of the month. In this table it will be seen how frequently the evening temperature exceeded that of the morning until convalescence was established. No definite proportion existed between the temperature and the rate of breathing or frequency of the pulse, nor was the temperature commensurate with the degree of spasm as, according to the history of the case, from the 10th to the 14th, the spasms of pain were greatest. On this day they...
