Because many of the combination contracts include cost-type obligations, those contracts coded as cost-reimbursement do not portray the full picture of the governments use of cost-reimbursement contracting. FPDS-NG does not delineate what contract types comprise those coded as combination, for example, whether they are cost-plus-award-fee and cost-plus-incentive-fee contracts, or a mix of fixed-price and labor-hour line items. We also identified conflicting definitions in the FPDS-NG user manual, which agency officials use as guidance when entering contract information into the database, that further complicate efforts to identify obligations under cost-reimbursement contracts. For contracts composed of more than one contract type, instructions direct agencies to identify the type with greater contract value. For example, if a contract has both cost-reimbursement and fixed-price portions but the fixed-price portion of the contract makes up 55 percent of the expected contract v. . .
